which he produces them we measure his improvement by the differences between his earlier and his later products every teacher is making such measurements constantly but they are likely to be rough and not easily or surely comparable one with another if a hundred teachers of drawing were asked to state as exactly and clearly as they could the achievement represented by the production of the drawings of fig i each in ten minutes with no copy at hand by a twelve year old boy who had had the training of grades 1 5 of the new york city schools many of them would make only such vague rough statements as good fair somewhat above the average satisfactory and the like if some of them did give appar ently fine estimates such as 82 by my scale of grading or c by my scale of grading or as good as the work of the thirteenth child from the top in my class of forty these esti mates would not be easily and surely comparable one with another or with similar estimates concerning other drawings each
