fighting has gotten a bad name it should not be so fighting itself is neither moral nor immoral only its object can be said to be so we may count the ability to fight well when applied to a just cause among the virtues to be moral is not to fight no one to be moral is to fight those who vitiate life and civilization that the moral are far less willing to fight than the immoral has always hurt societies the moral would do far better to follow revanchism a policy of retaliation our chief concern should be for first life then civilization fighting may foster life and

civilization and not fighting harm them if you truly wish to make the world a better place you should sometimes fight human beings lie along two general continua one continuum runs from concern for the group to concern for oneself the other from concern for the long term to concern for the short those who are concerned about the long term well being of the group must ever and anon fight those who are concerned only about their short term interests the latter are partisans not of the group but only of themselves we should not feel remorse at hurting blackguards we are doing society and perhaps them a favor for many a thrashing is as condign as it is salutary the art of war is an art with principles said napoleon and these principles must never be violated the best study of these principles is the lives of those who applied them best just as we read great writers to learn how to write well so too should we study great fighters to learn how to fight well life fighting explicates the principles by which julius caesar richelieu talleyrand napoleon and bill gates fought by which they attained their objects life fighting is fascinating it has much sage advice and is immensely erudite and fluid i have never seen writing so good a reviewer with stanford university press sweet s book is wonderful and should be savored he offers countless insights and observations not only on his subjects but also on life and human conduct in general needham b whitfield former chairman and ceo brengo inc i have become an avid reader of life fighting i have found it to be sublime erudite and above all inspirational it certainly stands out in the crowd for its level of depth scholarship and profundity clayton w chan esq sweet has managed using a few key historical leaders to uncover critical principles that have great relevance for us all he reminds us that the study of history remains richly rewarding dr philip b breitfeld chief strategy and innovation officer champions oncology
