the paper examines the joint impact of inflation targeting and fiscal rules on fiscal behavior and inflation in a broad panel of advanced and developing economies over the period 1990-2009 the main contribution of the paper is to show that as suggested by the theoretical literature interactions between fiscal rules and inflation matter a great deal for policy outcomes specifically the combination of inflation targeting and fiscal rules appears to deliver more disciplined macroeconomic policies than each of these institutions in isolation in addition the sequencing of the monetary and fiscal reforms plays a role adopting inflation targeting before it delivers stronger results than the reverse sequence this paper assesses the impact of different types of flexible fiscal rules on the procyclicality of fiscal policy with propensity scores matching techniques thus mitigating traditional self selection problems it finds that not all fiscal rules have the same impact the design matters specifically investment friendly rules reduce the procyclicality of both overall and investment spending the effect appears stronger in bad times and when the rule is enacted at the national level the introduction of escape clauses in fiscal rules does not seem to affect the cyclical stance of public spending the inclusion of cyclical adjustment features in spending rules yields broadly similar results the results are mixed for cyclically adjusted budget balance rules enacting the latter is associated with countercyclical movements in overall spending but with procyclical changes in investment spending structural factors such as past debt the level of development the volatility of terms of trade natural resources endowment government stability and the legal enforcement and monitoring arrangements backing the rule also influence the link between fiscal rules and countercyclicality the results are robust to a wide set of alternative specifications this paper analyzes the behavior of output during currency crises using a sample of 195 crisis episodes in 91 developing countries during 1970-98. It finds that more than two fifths of the crises in the sample were expansionary and that output contraction was greater in large and more developed economies than in small and less developed economies. Currency crises have not been any more contractionary in the 1990s than in the previous two decades. Countries that traded less with the rest of the world that had a relatively open capital account and where crises were preceded by large capital inflows were more likely to be associated with contraction. During crises the contraction was more pronounced if trade competitors devalued, oil prices rose during the crisis and postcrisis period was marked by tight monetary policy and expansionary fiscal policy.
