an investigation has been conducted to determine the effects of decomposition chamber size and catalyst bed material arrangement on the thrust buildup and decay time for a 90 percent hydrogen peroxide control rocket the rocket produced about 35 pounds of static thrust at a chamber pressure of 300 pounds per square inch catalyst bed loading ranged up to about 0.50 pound of propellant per second per square inch of bed five configurations including two decomposition chamber lengths and various arrangements of the catalytic material were tested on a static test stand at various chamber pressures and rocket case temperatures chamber pressure buildup time was mainly dependent upon rocket case temperature being long at low temperatures and decreasing to about 0.05 second for rocket case temperatures equal to or greater than 1000 f variations in decomposition chamber arrangement and steady state chamber pressure produced little difference in the starting time delay chamber pressure decay time to 10 percent of steady state chamber pressure varied from about 0.06 to 0.11 second and the chamber pressure decayed completely in 0.08 to 0.20 second at all test conditions
