in this provocative book david novitz reconsiders the complex relations between art and life he rejects the view that artwork should be judged in isolation from its historical and cultural contexts pointing to the many ways in which the cultural milieu affects choices made by the artist he challenges the commonplace notion of art as something removed from daily life by invisible yet rigid boundaries rather novitz argues much art is unrecognized as such because it addresses issues and preoccupations of everyday life and is therefore viewed as low brow or merely popular in fact the author contends not only does art invariably reflect our lives but it often consciously attempts to influence our lives popular genres like cinema advertising pop music erotica conversation gardening cooking and carpentry are all seen as arts and novitz traces the differentiation of these from the so called fine arts to the renaissance when moneyed classes patronized artists as a form of social self promotion this separation was reinforced in the nineteenth century with the emergence of the aesthetic movement and its distinction between high art and the popular arts by providing a sustained and lively challenge to the traditional boundaries of art novitz demonstrates the detail and explains the extent of the integration of art into everyday life he does not however endorse the postmodernist claim that there are no boundaries between art and life instead he argues that our conception of the relations between art life and philosophy need to be rethought in a way that reflects more adequately the role that both art and philosophy play in our lives at its most powerful novitz argues art is a form of seduction that can destabilize our commitments and entire world views and does so in ways that are unavailable to rational persuasion while carefully considering but rejecting oscar wilde s claim that life is in fact the mirror and art the reality novitz makes the case that art properly conceived reaches deeply into our lives and is profoundly influential
